In a period where police and academics benefit from coproduction in research and education, the need for a critical perspective on key challenges is pressing. Palgrave's Critical Policing Studies is a series of high quality, research-based books which examine a range of cutting-edge challenges and developments to policing and their social and political contexts. They seek to provide evidence-based case studies and high quality research, combined with critique and theory, to address fundamental challenging questions about future directions in policing.

Through a range of formats including monographs, edited collections and short form Pivots, this series provides research at a variety of lengths to suit both academics and practitioners. The series brings together new topics at the forefront of policing scholarship but is also organised around who the contemporary police are, what they do, how they go about it, and the ever-changing external environments which bear upon their work.

The series will cover topics such as: the purpose of policing and public expectations, public health approaches to policing, policing of cyber-crime, environmental policing, digital policing, social media, Artificial Intelligence and big data, accountability of complex networks of actors involved in policing, austerity, public scrutiny, technological and social changes, over-policing and marginalised groups, under-policing and corporate crime, institutional abuses, policing of climate change, ethics, workforce, education, evidence-based policing, and the pluralisation of policing.

Preface

The chapters collected here are one part of the outputs that have emerged from participants on an EU-funded Collaboration on Science and Technology (COST) Action on Police Stops. This Action began work in 2018 with four key themes. We explored: the practice of police stops; how those stops were experienced; the ways in which the police were accountable for their actions; and the political and social context in which police stops took place. This volume is the output of the last of these themes. Specifically, we wanted to understand why it was that a practice so controversial in the United States and the United Kingdom had received comparatively little attention elsewhere among EU states. What was it about the histories, legal systems or social fabric of countries that might influence the prominence of police stops as a public issue. In answer to so broad a question, we find the echoes of colonialism in the United Kingdom, France, Belgium and the Netherlands. Recent experiences of authoritarian government in Eastern Europe were a more pertinent influence, tending to make for more tolerance of policing as it reformed. Across the south of Europe, in particular, migration has also played into the mix. But these grander narratives are then the backdrop to local dramas, whether that be deaths at the hands of the police or controversies over the misuse of powers.

We bring together here thirteen chapters exploring the rise, fall and rise again of policing as a public issue to further our understanding and, perhaps, to prompt reflection and a reinvigorated debate. But we do so while reminding readers that this is one element of the output from the COST Action on Police Stops. There will be a second volume in Palgrave's Critical Policing Studies series exploring the governance and accountability of police stops. There has also been a special issue of the Journal of Organizational Ethnography and a podcast series (Vos Papiers S'il Vous Plait) as well as papers and reports (currently available at: polstops.eu/).

Acknowledgements

The editors would like to thank the authors of the chapters and other contributors to a series of online workshops in which these were developed during the pandemic. While these were not the convivial, in-person symposia we might have wished for, they did serve to bring out the themes and issues that you will find in this volume. We would also like to thank Sofie De Kimpe as the Chair of the COST Action on Police Stops for her support, and for the invaluable assistance of Mirko Miceli and Irina Baraliuc with all the details. Finally, thank you to the staff at Palgrave for their patience as this collection has come together.
